

Property and Casualty Insurance Class Action Update

2024 Q2

By Mark A. Johnson and Mathew G. Drocton

While we saw a lively first quarter in the property and casualty insurance class action space, the second quarter proved to be more muted. As detailed below, no large waves were made in labor depreciation and total loss vehicle class actions. But a new offensive theory emerged for insurance companies: an indemnification suit against the vehicle valuation provider over class action claims. A pair of medical payment class actions round out the quarter, with both courts affirming insurers' rights to adjust or deny claims based on policy language.

Labor Depreciation Claims Survive Dismissal

Plaintiffs recently had success in two labor depreciation class actions with a single-state class, rather than as previously asserted in multistate class actions. In Scott v. Safeco Ins. Co. of America, a Missouri district court followed its earlier decision in Brown to deny the insurer's motion for judgment on the pleadings against labor depreciation claims.¹ In Brown, the court had rejected the Eighth Circuit's interpretation of Missouri law and adopted a state intermediate court of appeals' decision that labor depreciation was impermissible absent express language to the contrary in the policy.² In the latest iteration of the battle over labor depreciation claims in Missouri, the Scott court found that regardless of whether the policy defines actual cash value or does not include the word "depreciation," without policy language allowing it, labor cannot be depreciated in determining actual cash value payments.

An Arizona district court decided similarly in Shumway v. Allstate Vehicle and Property Ins. Co., denying the insurer's motion to dismiss another labor depreciation class action.³ The court first rejected merits-based arguments under a motion to strike based on standing, then rejected those same arguments under a merits analysis. The court concluded that claims were not time-barred by a contractual one-year limitations period because the insurer had not established prejudice under Arizona law. "The mere late filing of a claim is an insufficient basis for enforcing the policy's limitation period."⁴ The court also refused to dismiss a declaratory relief claim, as it was not clear that it was duplicative of the breach of contract claim, although there was no discussion of a future, unstated property damage claim alleged by the plaintiff.⁵ Finally, the court let stand class allegations as premature to decide.⁶

Total Loss Vehicle Valuation Class Actions Continue

The total loss vehicle class actions challenging the use of projected sales adjustments continue to trend toward the insureds. Most recently, a couple of Carolina federal courts reached opposite conclusions. A North Carolina federal court followed the rationale from the line of cases challenging the use of CCC reports to value total loss vehicle claims and held that predominance cannot be met because determining whether an insured was paid less than actual cash value requires an “individualized inquiry not susceptible to class-wide proof or resolution.”⁷ But a South Carolina district court found predominance was satisfied and granted certification because “[f]raming the issue as whether the application of PSAs breached ... policies ... resolves” the predominance concerns.⁸

The Second Circuit provided a glimmer of hope for an insurer’s claim against the valuation service provider. The insurer settled a class action claim alleging that the use of Audatex resulted in undervaluation of vehicle claims. Following the settlement, the insurer brought suit against Audatex, arguing that its agreement with Audatex requires indemnification for claims or losses “arising out of ... work product provided by [Audatex].”⁹ The district court dismissed the insurer’s indemnification claim, finding that the provision did not cover the undervaluation claims, but the Second Circuit reversed.¹⁰ The court found that the insurer’s allegations that Audatex provided valuations used to value total loss vehicle, which included the adjustment at issue in the class action, are sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss.¹¹

Inherent Diminished Value Class Action Rejected, Again

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court previously held that insurers must pay third-party claimants inherent diminished value (IDV).¹² Following that decision, the trial court denied class certification, finding that in determining whether a class member suffered diminished value, “individualized proof, analysis, and findings would be required to determine whether any putative class member’s vehicle suffered some amount of IDV and, if so, how much.”¹³ The plaintiff subsequently sought to amend the complaint to include additional expert support that IDV always exists in a subset of circumstances, but the court rejected the motion as an improper attempt to relitigate class certification.¹⁴

Salvage Vehicle Class Action Rejected

In USAA Cas. Ins. Co. v. Letot, the Texas Supreme Court reversed certification of a class of insureds whose vehicles the insurer allegedly converted by filing salvage title paperwork with the Texas regulator.¹⁵ The court rejected certification of an injunctive relief class because the plaintiff could not establish a likelihood of future injury – that is, of being struck by another USAA-insured driver.¹⁶ The court also rejected certification of a damages class, but on predominance grounds. The court held that “[i]ndividual issues would almost surely overwhelm the common issue of whether USAA exercised dominion and control over class members’ property when it filed Reports concerning their vehicles. Notably, the threshold question of standing may itself present an insurmountably individualized inquiry under these circumstances.”¹⁷

Medical Payments Class Claims Rejected

The Florida Supreme Court weighed in on a certified question from the Eleventh Circuit about the amount of reimbursements for medical expenses that an insurer is required to pay under a personal injury protection (PIP) policy.¹⁸ In Allstate Ins. Co. v. Revival Chiropractic, LLC, the provider billed amounts lower than under the maximum charges specified by a statutory schedule, then the insurer paid 80 percent of the billed charges.¹⁹ Importantly, under the policy in question, the insurer agreed to pay 80 percent of reasonable medical services and the methodology for determining the amount paid will be pursuant to the statutory fee schedule limitations or any other limitations.²⁰ The court explained that under an earlier ruling, it had held that the statutory schedule of maximum charges was only an optional method of capping reimbursements, rather than an exclusive method for determining reimbursement rates.²¹ The overriding statutory mandate was that insurers pay 80 percent of reasonable expenses. Because the policy allowed the insurer to diverge from the statutory schedule of maximum charges and pay 80 percent of charges, the insurer acted within the policy and statutory framework to pay 80 percent of charges below the maximum amount specified by the schedule.²²

The Eleventh Circuit put to rest another medical payments class action in *Sisia v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co.*²³ In Sisia, the court of appeals had previously upheld dismissal of illusory coverage claims as time-barred, but let stand a claim for breach of contract alleging that the insurer was required to pay all medical expenses.²⁴ On appeal a second time, it affirmed dismissal of the medical payments claim. The court held that because the insurance policy requires payment of only those expenses that it deems “reasonable” and “necessary – not all medical expenses – the breach of contract claim was properly dismissed²⁵

Takeaways

1. Labor depreciation class actions continue their trend in favor of insureds on the merits.
2. Courts continue to split on class certification in total loss vehicle class actions over whether the permissibility of a projected sales adjustment can be decided in gross or instead requires an individual assessment of each vehicle’s value.
3. A putative class action challenging titling practices presents insurmountable predominance issues, while standing continues to be a sometimes useful tool for challenging injunctive relief classes.
4. Medical payment claims falter for insureds based on carefully crafted policy language that provides insurers with discretion over payment practices.
